

The snow view, right, was taken soon after the New York Hospital-Westchester Division complex was completed.

North Street runs through the middle of the picture.

The houses in the foreground are on Westchester Avenue. When Interstate 287 was constructed, these houses were destroyed.

The Administration building, below, both views. The jitney and autos at right must be bound for a special activity.

Chartered by King George III in 1771, the New York Hospital was better known as Bloomingdale Hospital, so called for the road in New York City on which the hospital was originally located.

In 1821, that facility moved "7 miles north of the city," to today's Columbia University site.

About 300 acres of land were purchased from Samuel Faile in 1868, for the Westchester Division, but construction did not commence until 1891.

Frederick Law Olmsted, who created New York City's Central Park, laid out the roads and grounds of the hospital in White Plains.
